In this new environment, the legacy features in Photoshop will be given the very best of the CPU-based feature set in the Adobe Creative Cloud, while the native API-based features will be accelerated on native AMD GPU features of the new apps. At the moment, we are making key features of the legacy GPU-based 3D features available as native API features. For example, Photoshop Lightroom has the ability to apply lighting, layer effects and file operations to images in the same feature set as native GPU accelerated apps. The legacy 3D feature set is currently being ported, so it will be some while before every legacy feature from 3D is available in the native API version. Where supported, the legacy GPU version will be accelerated by the new technique. Premium members of the Creative Cloud Photography, Video, and Mobile plans can also expect to eventually see a timeline in Adobe's New Features and Releases for each of these products that provides a roadmap for new features and technology. By having these timelines for the individual products, and with upwards cloud-like compatibility, there should be fewer gaps in functionality. We have been working closely with Apple to enable a range of new features and APIs in the new hardware and graphics architecture. To make this happen, we needed to rewrite many of the native API parts of the app. This included freeing up the GPU of any 3D image manipulation, pushing rendering to the native GPU, and embedding 2D drawing directly into the new architecture.
